Learning different kinds of words (nouns, verbs, etc.) and their relationship to each other (grammar) helps children develop confidence and skill in using language. Answer key included. Research Question(s): To what extent will direct instruction, modeling, and peer editing affect my students' ability to write a well-structured paragraph focusing specifically on strong topic sentences? How does the intervention impact my student's self-perceptions towards writing topic sentences and paragraph structure? Research Activities: Context: This intervention study was done in an 8th grade U.S. History class of ethnically diverse 30 students. These students attended a 7/8 junior high school in a large urban area of Northern California. Seven focus students were chosen to be a cross section of the class as a whole. Four of the focus students are English learners with CELDT classifications from Early-Intermediate to Re-designated, while the other three students are native English speakers. These focus students also run the gamut regarding grades and academic skills. Methods and Data: This study uses three different approaches to teaching middle school students about how to write a paragraph. The first two days of the intervention were direct instruction. I gave my students a lecture and a note taking guide to help them learn the parts of a paragraph and the characteristics of a well written topic sentence. After these lectures, I had the students write a paragraph and complete a survey regarding writing. Next I modeled for the students, example paragraphs. I gave the students handouts of paragraphs that were well written and had strong topic sentences as well as paragraphs with weak topic sentences. I made observations as the class read each paragraph and discussed the merits of the first sentence. If the sentence was deemed to be inappropriate, the students wrote their own improved sentence. Once these lessons were through, I collected another paragraph and survey from my students. Finally, I had my students peer edit a classmate's paragraph. Each student had a checklist to help them stay focused as they edited and I observed them during this process. The students then took their draft home and improved it with the comments made in class. I collected these paragraphs and a third survey about how the students feel about their writing skills. My post-intervention data was a paragraph written as part of an end of the unit test and an attitudinal survey asking them to reflect on the intervention as a whole. At the end of the study, I compared all of the data collected during and after the intervention to baseline data collected during the first semester of the school year. These pre-intervention data are in the form of a paragraph written on a test, two different surveys asking the students about their own perceptions of writing, and observations made while the students were working on a project that required writing. Findings and Conclusions: The students in this class felt as though their writing has improved, when in fact, the rubric shows otherwise. This is only when considering the pre and the post-intervention data. During the intervention; however, the students' paragraph writing skills did improve, as demonstrated by an inclusion of topic sentences and the grading rubric. One explanation for this trend are that the students are more aware of how a good writer organizes a paragraph and are taking more risks trying to master these skills. The anxiety of a testing situation may have led some students to "forget" what they had learned over the course of the intervention which is why many students did not adequately incorporate topic sentences in the post-intervention data. To continue this research, I plan on working next on teaching my students how to tie the evidence in a paragraph back to the topic sentence to make sure that the whole paragraph stays on one topic. Grade Level: 8. Data Collection Methods: Observation-Teacher Research Journal, Student Work, Survey-Attitude, Writing Samples. The text begins with the principles of grammar and progresses to the writing process for a paragraph. A chapter on Writing from Reading explains how students can write summaries and reaction paragraphs from reading selections, and it provides tips for writing answers to essay exam questions. This book is designed to provide elementary school teachers with information, suggestions, and models for using writing in the social studies, from early primary to middle grades. There are four major chapters to the book. Chapter I is titled "Research on the Teaching of Writing." The articles in this first section move from a survey of research in writing to a survey of classroom practice in the use of writing in elementary school social studies and finally to a specific classroom study that integrates the two areas and presents specific implications for the study and teaching of writing. Chapter II is titled "Developing Readiness in Writing." The first two articles stress two important aspects of a classroom environment that nurtures and supports student writing. The remaining five articles describe techniques such as interviewing, exploring the past, and brainstorming that teachers can use to initiate writing. The title of Chapter III which contains seven articles is "Using Writing to Learn Social Studies Content." The articles describe ways in which writing can be used to help students learn social studies information or develop social studies generalizations. Another describes how writing can be used to conduct simulated field trips in the social studies classroom. The title of Chapter IV is "Combining Writing with Social Studies." Discussed are three essential supports for a successful program: a detailed curriculum guide, inservice teacher training, and cooperative teacher/administrator assessment procedures. The book also cites related resources in the ERIC system. (Author/RM) Being a great teacher is more than lesson plans and seating charts. The goal of teaching writing is to create independent and self-motivated writers. When students write more often, they become better at writing. They acquire habits, skills, and strategies that enable them to learn more about the craft of writing. Yet they require the guidance and support of a more knowledgeable person who understands the writing process, the changes over time in writing development, and specific techniques and procedures for teaching writing. In Scaffolding Young Writers: A Writers' Workshop Approach, Linda J. Dorn and Carla Soffos present a clear road map for implementing writers' workshop in the primary grades. Adopting an apprenticeship approach, the authors show how explicit teaching, good models, clear demonstrations, established routines, assisted teaching followed by independent practice, and self-regulated learning are all fundamental in establishing a successful writers' workshop. There is a detailed chapter on organizing for writers' workshop, including materials, components, routines, and procedures. Other chapters provide explicit guidelines for designing productive mini-lessons and student conferences. Scaffolding Young Writers also features: An overview of how children become writers; Analyses of students' samples according to informal and formal writing assessments Writing checklists, benchmark behaviors, and rubrics based on national standards Examples of teaching interactions during mini-lessons and writing conferences Illustrations of completed forms and checklists with detailed descriptions, and blank reproducible forms in the appendix for classroom use Instruction is linked with assessment throughout the book, so that all teaching interactions are grounded in what children already know and what they need to know as they develop into independent writers. Why you need a writing revolution in your classroom and how to lead it The Writing Revolution (TWR) provides a clear method of instruction that you can use no matter what subject or grade level you teach. The model, also known as The Hochman

Method, has demonstrated, over and over, that it can turn weak writers into strong communicators by focusing on specific techniques that match their needs and by providing them with targeted feedback. Insurmountable as the challenges faced by many students may seem, The Writing Revolution can make a dramatic difference. And the method does more than improve writing skills. It also helps: Boost reading comprehension Improve organizational and study skills Enhance speaking abilities Develop analytical capabilities The Writing Revolution is as much a method of teaching content as it is a method of teaching writing. There's no separate writing block and no separate writing curriculum. Instead, teachers of all subjects adapt the TWR strategies and activities to their current curriculum and weave them into their content instruction. But perhaps what's most revolutionary about the TWR method is that it takes the mystery out of learning to write well. It breaks the writing process down into manageable chunks and then has students practice the chunks they need, repeatedly, while also learning content. Millikens new Assessing Language series for Grades 4-8 gives teachers a rich variety of reproducible standards-based assessments.

Each book contains 56 grade-appropriate worksheets suitable for monitoring skill retention as well as practice and reinforcement. Put your students on the road to success with these easy lessons that build basic writing skills and get kids ready for the standardized tests. These hands-on activities teach punctuation, capitalization, sequencing, and much more. Students learn about periods by mini "stop signs" at the end of sentences in the morning message, identify main idea by brainstorming titles to stories, and use graphic organizers to plan their own stories. Milliken's new "Assessing Language" series for Grades 4-8 gives teachers a rich variety of reproducible standards-based assessments. Each book contains 56 grade-appropriate worksheets suitable for monitoring skill retention as well as practice and reinforcement.
